TO

WILLIAM STOKES, M.D.,

D.C.L., F.R.S.

Sir,

The most grateful tribute I can offer to Dr Petrie's memory, is to associate with those Airs he loved so well, the name of his dearest and most valued friend; allow me therefore to inscribe to you, this Volume of the Petrie Collection, and to remain,

With sincere respect,

Your faithful Servant,

F. HOFFMANN.

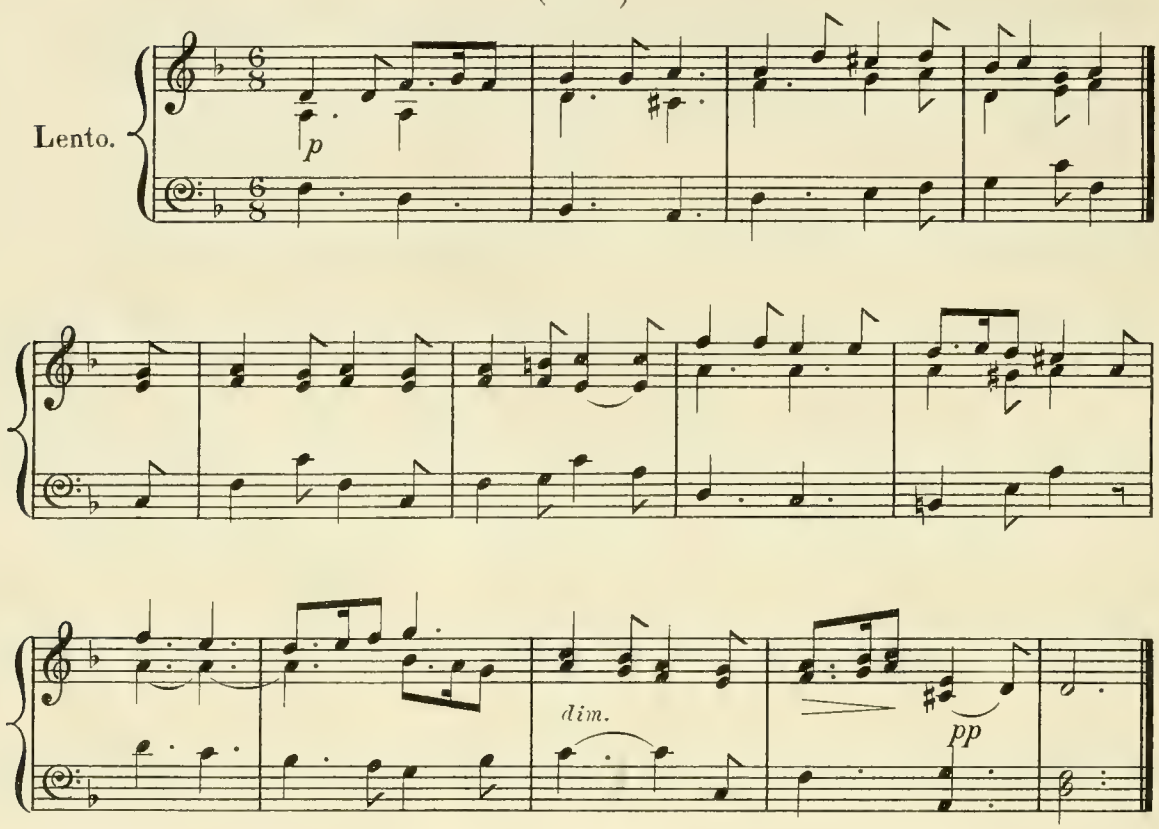
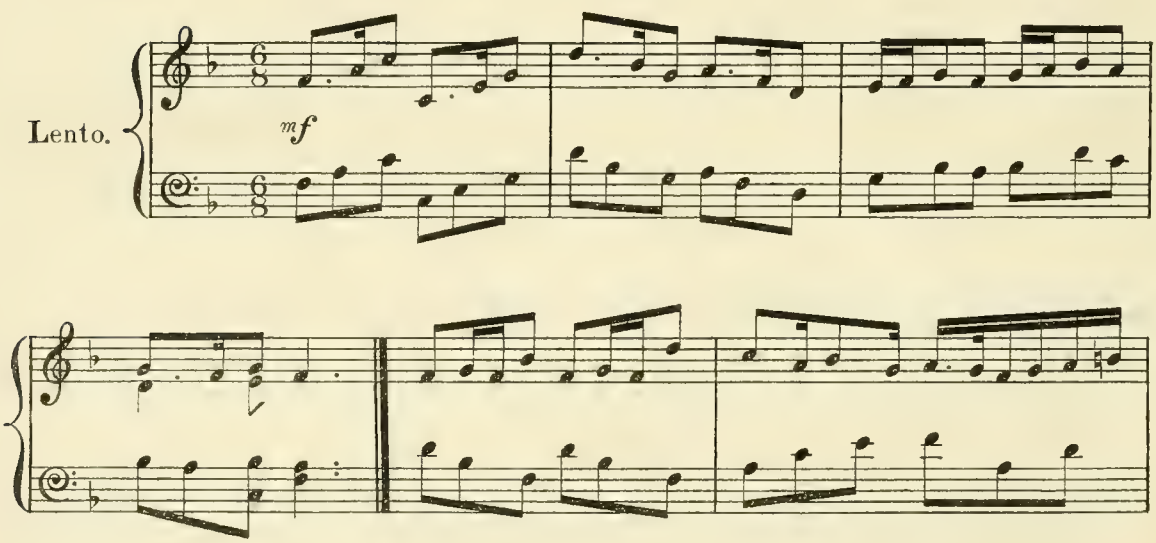
The following three Airs are from Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book. They have been already published by Mr W. Chappell in his Work on "Popular Music of the olden Time," Vol. II. page 793, and are reprinted here by that Author's kind permission.

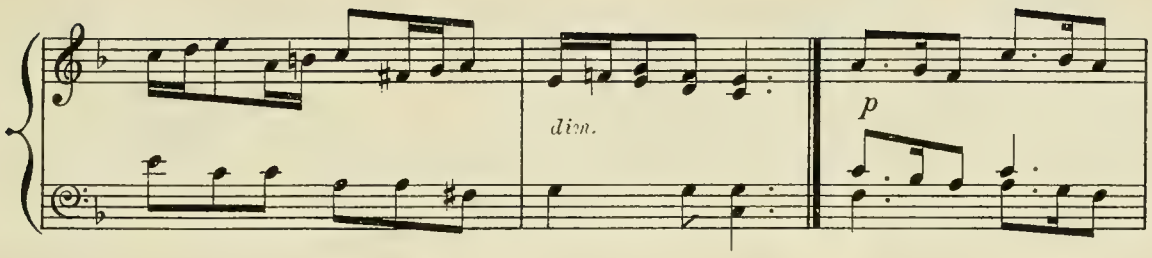
The Irish Ho-Hoane.

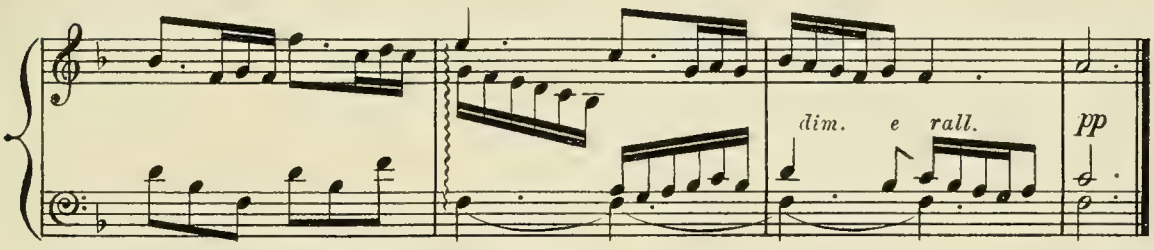
(Ochone.)



The Irish Dumpe.



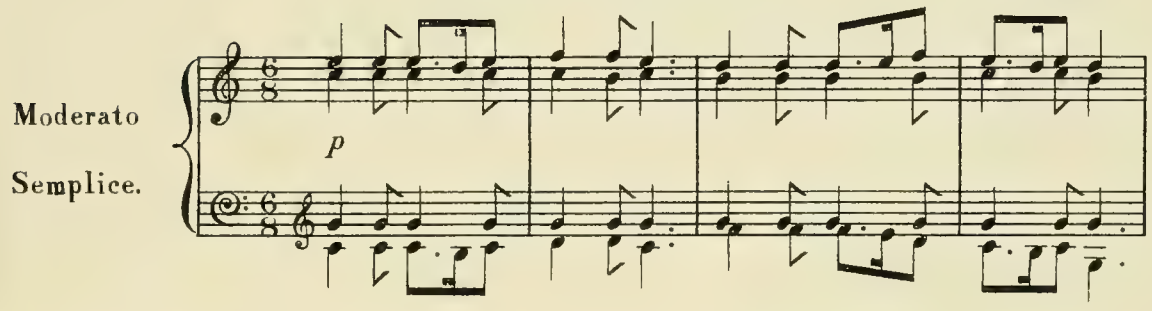


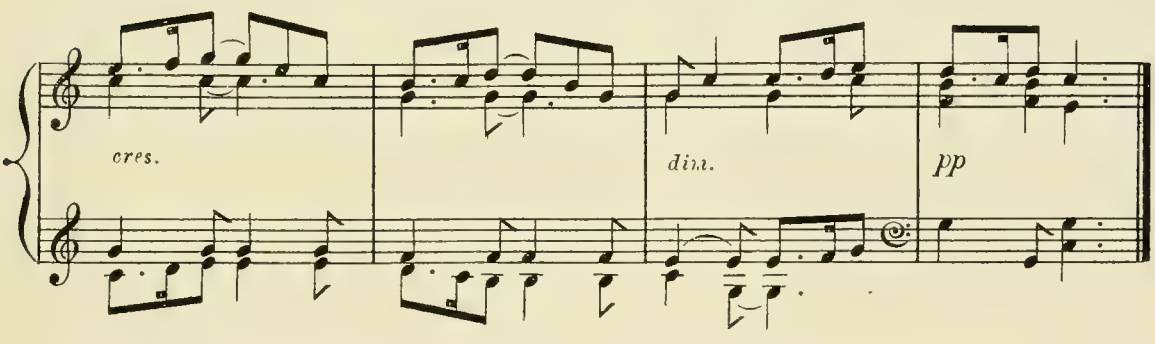


Callino Casturame.

Moderato

Semplice.





It is evidently to this tune that Shakespeare alludes in the play of Henry the Fifth, Act IV. Sc. 4. where Pistol on meeting a French soldier, exclaims "Quality! Calen o custure me!" In the folio we find "Calmie custure me!" which has been turned, in the modern Editions, into "Call you me?— Construe me!" Malone found among "Sundry new Sonets in a handefull of pleasant Delites 1584", a Sonet of a Lover in praise of his Lady to "Calen o custure me!" sung at every line's end. In Mr Lovers "Lyrics of Ireland," he notices the resemblance of the first word to the name "Caillino," speaking of Mrs Fitzsimon's beautiful Poem, "The Woods of Caillino," and adds— Mr Boswell, in his Edition of Shakespeare says that Mr Finnegan, Master of the school established in London for the education of the Irish, says the words mean "Little Girl of my Heart for ever and ever!" now this is not the meaning, and I cannot but wonder that, with so much literary discussion as has taken place on the subject, the true spelling, and consequently, the meaning of the burden have remained till now undiscovered. The burden, as given in the "Handefull of pleasant Delites!" and copied by Malone, is "Calen o custure me" which is an attempt to spell, and pretty nearly represents the sound of "Colleen oge astore," and those words mean "Young Girl, my Treasure." Stokes's life of Petrie, p. 431.
